

New Zealand International Conference on Contemporary China

Financial Liberalisation and the Renminbi: Implications for New Zealand

25 October 2017, 9am—5pm
Fale Pasifika, University of Auckland

On the 18th of October, China will host the 19th Party Congress to determine its top leaders and set its policy direction for the next five years. The 18th Party Congress introduced the idea of ongoing deep market reform of China's economic and financial system but questions remain as to how well these reforms have been carried out and to China's ongoing commitment to financial liberalisation.

- Will the 19th Party Congress bode well for the goal of deepening financial reform?
- What are the implications for the internationalisation of the Chinese financial sector?
- How will efforts to internationalise China's globally underutilised currency impact New Zealand's trade, capital flows and financial transactions with China?

These issues will be examined in Auckland on 25 October in our 2017 International Conference on Contemporary China. The New Zealand Contemporary China Research Centre is bringing an outstanding line-up of economic commentators, financial analysts, commercial and central bankers and scholars from China, Hong Kong, Australia and New Zealand.

Join us to debate the future of China's financial liberalisation and internationalisation and its impact on New Zealand trade, business and investment flows in the first conference following China's five-yearly Party Congress.

Register here

for more information go to: www.victoria.ac.nz/chinaresearchcentre

The New Zealand Contemporary China Research Centre is based at Victoria University of Wellington and has all eight of New Zealand's universities as members.